How to talk to a non-specialist

Abstract:

Although writing research papers and giving talks is part of a scientist's job, any training for these skills is often ad-hoc and often focusses on speaking to one's own community. However, science is becoming ever more collaborative and interdisciplinary, which is often made difficult by communication barriers. As an editor on a journal that strives to speak to all physicists, it is part of my job to break down these barriers and help our authors talk to a broader audience. In this talk, I will share some basic principles that facilitate communication across subject borders.
